Introduction to Student Societies

Student societies are groups run by student committees with the intention of attracting like-minded people to share a common interest. Often the groups are founded with the aim of involving people in student life beyond the boundaries of their subject area, in order to expand the student's experience of life at university. Societies or clubs can be set up to focus on a wide variety of topics and interests, from academic subjects to unusual social activities. Although often designed for specific groups within certain departments, generally they are open to all students from any faculty.

Student societies offer many different opportunities in which the members can participate, ranging from organising publications and lectures to social events. Up until the mid-twentieth century university clubs and societies were primarily academically focused, specifically offering lectures and opportunities for discussion of a given subject. However, nowadays student societies are of a more social nature, although there still are those that do exist solely for academic purposes. Many of the societies receive funding through affiliation to either Queen Margaret Union or Glasgow University Union, or both, or through the Student's Representative Council.
